TOBACCO CURING BY HEAT.

New Type of Closed Barn Used by a Connecticut Grower.

Tobacco growing is counted among the bazardous lines of agriculture in that a crop may be totally destroyed within a very short time by unit or by pole sweat in the curing shed. Danger of hall damage is eliminated in the growing of shade tobacco, but the menace of pole swent is as great as ever. Last season, however, the first scientific experiment on a large scate to guard against pole swent in cigar leaf tobacco was made on the farm of William Pinney at Suffield, Coun. The result may ultimately place the farmer in absolute control of the curing process, shortening the time and determining the shade the tobacco shall be when it has been cured. The experiment was simply the utilfantion of artificial heat during the curing process. Some kinds of heavy leaf tobacco are cured in tight barns and with fire, and it has long been a common practice to build charcoal fires in the barns when tobacco was in grave danger of being ruined by pole sweat. But until the experiment on the Pinney farm no effort had been made to control the curing and coloring of cigar leaf.

A special type of barn is required for this work. A ventilator along the entire ridge which may be readily opened or closed tight is an important fenture. Instead of the crude charcoal burners placed on the ground, creating a fire menace, specially constructed furnaces, five in number, were placed in the ground. The feed doors are on the outside of the building, so that smoke and vapors from the fire cannot enter the barn and affect the flavor, of the tobacco. The smoke pipe of each furnace runs across the entire width of the building and returns on a paralfel ten feet away and at a slight pitch. The vents are in the side of the barn, The smoke pipe forms the only heat radiating service.

Immediately after the crop was put into the barn the fires were started and the barn closed tightly. The tem-
